What You'll Need to Know Before Shooting Pictures This article details the basic steps you'll need to know before shooting to ensure that your images are ideal for digital manipulation in Photoshop. Before You Shoot a Photo Choose an Appropriate Scene A single, well-planned scene can yield dozens, even hundreds, of great images. A good scene will not be cluttered with objects that will interfere with your subject or background. Your subject should be defined and the surroundings should be non-intrusive. Don't be afraid to include elements like trees, fences or other backgrounds that may create a visual frame for your subject. An interesting backdrop can help create the right mood for your images. Get Started Shoot If your subject is moving, don't start shooting when you're close to it. Wait until the subject is in an area where you can shoot a series of action shots over time. Keep in mind that you'll have to stop and start shooting frequently—don't run at your subjects and expect to get a great shot every time you do. When you take your first shot, you won't have any idea if you have a good shot or not. Work in Brackets With your camera set to Aperture mode, check your settings and choose manual settings that will produce your desired results. Aperture priority, Shutter priority, and Program modes are all equally viable for camera work. If you are interested in having a narrow depth of field and using camera settings to render a shallow depth of field, Shutter priority is the best choice. For still subjects, a setting of 200 or less is usually the most desirable aperture to start. You can increase the aperture as needed for moving subjects and for photographing moving objects or light that changes with each shot. The greater the F number, the more you'll have to stop the movement. For example, if you choose an aperture of F5 and you want a shutter speed of 1/8th of a second, you'll need a shutter speed of 1/8th of a second to keep the subject in motion. If your subject is moving at 5 fps (frames per second) and you select a shutter speed of 1/8 of a second, you'll need a camera of F5 to use that shutter speed to freeze the subject's movement. Aperture priority is effective for shooting moving subjects like birds or musicians. When choosing between a shutter speed of 1
