Role of amyloid beta-peptides in the development of Alzheimer's disease. Alzheimer's disease (AD) is characterized by a progressive deterioration of memory and other cognitive functions. Histopathological examination reveals the presence of senile plaques and neurofibrillary tangles in brain parenchyma of AD patients. While the role of tau, a microtubule-associated protein, in the neurofibrillary tangle formation has been well established, the mechanism by which the amyloid beta (A beta)-containing senile plaque is formed is still unclear. Current evidence indicates that amyloid precursor proteins (APP) are proteolytically processed into peptides of varying lengths and the peptides of 40-42 amino acid residues are commonly found as the major constituents of senile plaques. More recently, proteolytic processing of APP to remove the amyloid peptides is increasingly regarded as a crucial event in the disease process and also in the formation of neuritic plaques. Moreover, it is now well documented that the beta-amyloid peptides play a central role in the progression of AD, while the mechanisms underlying the events that lead 1cb139a0ed
