I am a freelance writer, translator, and translator of children's books. I am retired but I have a very busy schedule!Q: Z-order on a OpenGL ES 2.0 texture I'm not sure how to find out the z-order of a texture in OpenGL ES 2.0. And if I can, how do I correctly render it in multiple passes? For example, what are the steps to setup the view for rendering an object with multiple different textures: Define the view, which in my case is a simple color buffer? Set the appropriate projection? Bind the texture? ...is there anything else? More to the point, how are textures supposed to be rendered in more than one pass? I'm working on a sprite-based puzzle game, and the puzzle board draws from all around it. The texture I'm using for the board is 64x16 tiles of a greyscale image. The board itself has a texture of a specific tile with a foggy gradient filled in. Is it okay to only change the z-index and then render the complete image in one pass, or should I split the image up into the board and tiles and pass them as individual textures? A: I think there are a couple of things in order. Define the view, which in my case is a simple color buffer? Set the appropriate projection? Bind the texture? For these, you can use `glViewport` to specify the region of your view that you want to render. This is just a rectangle that you specify (which you can think of as a bounding box of an image), and then in your rendering loop, you can call glViewport twice to define a box that is the size of your view in the x/y direction and how many pixels wide and high in the z direction (depth) you want to render (or rather, how
