Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to a method for preparing a low density polyethylene film. 2. Background of the Invention Low density polyethylene (LDPE) films are used in a wide variety of applications. For example, LDPE films are used as bags in which a consumer may store loose objects. LDPE films are also used in packaging in which the films are laminated to a paper substrate. LDPE is typically prepared by polymerizing ethylene in a high pressure, high temperature process. The resulting film typically has a relatively low number of long chain branches. The molecular structure of LDPE is described in Handbook of Polymer Science and Engineering, Fourth Edition, Vol. 13, pp. 66-103 (J. Wiley and Sons 1991), incorporated herein by reference. A typical LDPE molecule has a molecular weight of about 25,000 to about 45,000 Daltons, a density of 0.926 g/cc to 0.963 g/cc and an alpha content of less than about 20%. This molecule has the following general structure: For commercial reasons, the melt index (MI) of LDPE is generally less than about 0.01 dg/min and the melt flow rate (MFR) is generally greater than about 50 g/10 min. In addition to the properties of LDPE films, such films are also preferably durable. Durable films are desirable since they generally remain flexible and do not fracture or crack when used in packaging, such as bags. Films that remain flexible, especially films that remain flexible when subjected to the rigors of commercial use, are desirable because they generally allow the film to be rolled into a package which is easy to store and transport. Films that do not fracture or crack during commercial use are highly desirable because they are less expensive to produce. It has been found that LDPE films having a
