Techasura OK, how are we going to teach people to use computers? ~~~ jakevoytko I'm not sure why this is surprising. Most people know they have a physical education schedule so they go to the gym. Most people know their day job takes a certain amount of time, so they go to work. Most people know their children are best to develop with parental guidance and "limits". Libraries were designed for all of these activities.

If you're going to go to the library to learn, you need to use that time. You don't have the same support structure in your public library. If you want to learn a subject, you'd better learn it when there's no-one watching. France has entered the drone market, with two firms successfully experimenting with unmanned aircraft. The announcement comes as France and Germany begin working on plans to create a common drone regulation which will inevitably impact drone operators in both countries. The first drone manufacturer was selected last week as of May 4th after receiving an open call for expressions of interest. L'Aerisence, a subsidiary of Airbus, has revealed it developed an Autonomous Aerial Vehicle (AAV) for military and commercial uses. This was a joint project with aerospace defense and communications company Thales. The firm says it completed its first drone in late 2016, and it's already in testing. It's a so-called Kinetic Unmanned Aircraft (KUA), aka microdrone, and it's the smallest in its class. It operates in full-autonomy, and it can cover a distance of 60 km in two hours with a battery of 2000 grams. This is the smallest in its
