From the creators of StarStuff: A couple of months ago I was playing around in my new computer and I found something pretty cool. I was interested in adding new functionality to my keyboard and just happened to find some application called "KeyboardEdit". It took me a while to understand the application, but after spending a couple of hours setting it up, I'm ready to say that it is a very useful application. This app allows you to create your own custom keyboard layout. If you're one of those people who, for instance, use Dvorak, you may want to make your own custom layout for typing on a Dvorak keyboard. To do this, you need to use a keyboard that has the keys for the characters you need to use. However, every keyboard has a different layout of the different keys on it. This program will let you import the characters you need into a specific layout, and then, when you need to use the characters, you can use a specific key on your keyboard to assign the character to your layout. The great thing about this program is that it will save your layout every time you use it. This means that if you need to reassign the functionality of some of your keys, you just need to import the key layout you used before and then do the reassignment of characters to it. There are three parts of the app: Import, Browse, and Export. To import characters, you need to click on the Import button on the toolbar and then choose a folder where you want to save the characters. You can then drag-and-drop the characters you have saved into a main window and then select the character you want to use from a list that comes up. You will then see an import window that lets you know which keys will be affected by the import. You can then select how many characters you want to assign to a specific key. You can choose to assign more than one character to the same key as well. You can also set the function for that character. For example, you can set the Backspace key to be shift+backspace, so it can clear a whole line of text. You can assign the Alt key to be the A character, and the Shift
