Cardiovascular complications can be prevented in high-risk patients by primary percutaneous coronary intervention (PPCI). For patients who require fibrinolytic therapy for acute coronary syndrome, the interventional cardiologist can minimize the clinical impact of the procedure by performing only PPCI. The clinical impact of pre- and postprocedural percutaneous cardiac interventions is defined by the distance between the coronary lesion and the closest point of the cardiac intervention. We have developed a new technique that we call percutaneous coronary intervention and fibrinolysis (PPCIF), which combines both approaches. In our study, PPCIF was performed in 49 patients. Seventy-seven percent of the patients required an intervention to complete fibrinolysis, 13% underwent primary coronary intervention, and 10% underwent a combination of PPCIF. Indications for PPCIF included: ongoing ischemia (56%); transient ST-segment elevation on the electrocardiogram (24%); and ST-segment depression on the electrocardiogram (24%). Coronary intervention was successful for 100% of the patients who underwent PPCIF. The technical success of PPCIF was 97%. No significant difference was observed between the complications of PPCIF and PPCI alone in a selected patient population. PPCIF may be used to treat high-risk patients who require anticoagulation for fibrinolysis.Blog posts If you've been looking for any type of self-help book, then I think you'll enjoy the latest creation from Best-Seller and Writer, Lucy Konijnendijk.
