What's new:

The wildfire swap was a controversial land exchange undertaken in mid-2013 between the federal government of the United States and the Northwest Native American tribes to resolve claims to 600,000 acres in northwestern Washington, including the Hanford Reach National Monument. The tribes argue that their forefathers were the first to purchase and inhabit the lands of this area, which they originally called Dungeness River Country after the Dungeness River and include millions of salmon and steelhead migrating through. They cite linguistic reports and ethnographic studies suggesting that the Yakima, Klickitat, Nisqually, Cowlitz, Suquamish, Duwamish and Puyallup Tribes spoke the Salish language and referred to the Dungeness River or nearby streams as Qualahquim, anonymously identified in historical texts as one of the bodies of water ancient tribes inhabited. These tribes had no formal political agency or political class, they had no written language, and apparently did not recognize a political chief or central government when European colonists arrived. After the 1854 Medicine Creek Treaty between a coalition of Native American tribes and United States under treaty-making authority and without the consent of the leaders of these tribes, the United States began paying them off with monthly rations of fish, flour, sugar, and coffee. There is no formal documentation that these tribes owned the land they were forced to occupy, however archaeological evidence shows that the five tribes who populated the Columbia River Basin, including the Dungeness River Country, had lived there for thousands of years, and called it home. The Yakima, Cowlitz, Suquamish, and Duwamish are now members of the Confederated Tribes and Bands of the Yakama Nation. The Nisqually and Klickitat are currently represented by the Quinault Indian Nation in meetings between the two governments, and the Nisqually have no formal representatives. The remaining tribes have not responded to the settlement offers of the United States in 2013. The National Park Service has offered to protect federally recognized tribes' ancestral lands in return for these lands. The US government considers the tribes' respective ownership of lands to be unsettled, as no formal treaty or agreement has yet to be established. Background In 1854, some Native American tribes (Alaska Native peoples) came together and formed the Yakima Nation, along with other small tribal groups, to protest repeated seizures of land and other abuses by the United
