"This is the step in the evolution of the sport we all love. We believe we've created a unique gaming experience using the technology that we believe current day football fans and gamers alike are using every day." Michael Young, general manager of Electronic Arts' FIFA business "We've been working closely with EA in the last few months to make sure they deliver their technology. Once you combine top-down social and top-down gameplay for the kind of intensity of a professional footballer on a pitch, it's going to provide a really unique kind of sense of speed, momentum and control," said Nick Marsh, vice president and GM at Iron Media. "You can feel the emotion, you can feel the different goals, and you can feel the pace of the game. So it's all there, which is exciting." Using player motion data, challenges for goals, tackles and interceptions are expressed in more detail and in a more lifelike way. And it's not just FIFA players who benefit from the new motion data, players of other sports like baseball and tennis will also feature the technology in their movement, as well as those of other sports, according to Marsh. "It's not just a football game, it's a football experience and the fans will be able to enjoy that," Marsh said. "It's not just a football game, it's a football experience and the fans will be able to enjoy that." "You'll start to see players reacting to the contact they're being subjected to, when to cut back, when to pass the ball, when to attack. There's a link between contact and reaction. So for the player, it's a completely new experience." FIFA never really goes out of its way to promote that there's a link between player contact and reaction. Iron Media says their different and it's certainly noticeable. And it's not just the movement, it's the timing of that movement. For example, players will cut back from defenders to create space for a pass. But they can also cut back and open themselves up in the process. So you have a lot more control over your own movements than you have in FIFA 17 or FIFA 18. "It's just like the real world, the players take the
