Hydrocarbon antifreezes are used in the motor vehicle industry to achieve a high degree of thermal protection and corrosion resistance in the cooling systems of motor vehicles. However, their use is severely limited because of their flammability or toxicity. The alternative, hydrocarbon coolants, are non-corrosive, non-flammable, and non-toxic but also lack the thermal protection capabilities of the hydrocarbon antifreezes. Moreover, coolants with similar thermal protection and corrosion resistance properties to the hydrocarbon antifreezes are generally highly volatile hydrocarbons. Hydrocarbons evaporate at freezing temperatures, thus losing cooling capacity, which results in loss of supercooling capability. U.S. Pat. No. 4,952,165 (Briso et al.) discloses a composition for preventing the corrosion of iron-containing substrates which is non-flammable, non-toxic, and non-corrosive and which is effective at temperatures below -70.degree.
