The solution enables them to use their own spectrum to create a single mobile network, which can then be more effectively integrated with the respective operator's infrastructure, and ultimately result in better return on investment. Rogers has licensed the rights to the technology to a leading MVNO in Australia, Australian 4G, where it plans to commence commercial roll-out. It follows the successful deployment of the technology in the UK, from which a local service provider, Manx Telecom, has developed the first entirely virtual network operator to be formed from the UK's award winning 5G spectrum. In the UK, Rogers owns mobile spectrum licensed from Ofcom, which is being used in local digital terrestrial broadcasting as well as the mobile spectrum for television. It has also made a number of recently announced spectrum orders in the United States, in which it acquired spectrum licenses for mobile services. The introduction of mobile virtual network operators in Britain has resulted in significant changes in network ownership and the subsequent cost and performance benefits to operators. Rogers has been at the forefront of this mobile revolution and now it is also pioneering the next wave of evolution in network ownership. With the launch of the two new services, Rogers has been able to demonstrate that spectrum is no longer a barrier to entry in the mobile industry. It's the collective spectrum we've got, not where it's from. Rogers is currently working to bring its technology to global markets, by working with some of the largest mobile operators in Europe, North America, Asia and Oceania. Rogers is also starting to make investment announcements for mobile infrastructure in these regions. The global roll-out of its mobile virtual network operator technology promises to be the game-changing next step in the evolution of the mobile industry.Hey, you." "They're even tougher than the
