Calcium pyrophosphate crystal arthritis is a common disorder of the elderly and a significant cause of musculoskeletal pain and disability. The most common arthritic manifestation of calcium pyrophosphate deposition disease is chondrocalcinosis, and calcium pyrophosphate crystal deposition disease of the spine is increasingly recognised. Calcium pyrophosphate deposition disease is not an active inflammatory disorder, but progresses toward irreversible joint damage and arthritic change in a relatively short time. The chondrocalcinotic process may be stimulated by joint trauma or overuse. Nonsteroidal antiinflammatory drugs are of little value and long-term use is associated with a significant risk of gastrointestinal bleeding. Low-dose aspirin or colchicine may decrease the frequency of attacks or reduce the intensity of pain. Therapeutic agents that inhibit cartilage destruction have been developed, but the available drugs are effective in only a limited number of cases. Therefore, prevention remains the best means of reducing the progression and disability associated with calcium pyrophosphate crystal arthritis.MIPs MIPs is an annual multidisciplinary conference held every April at the University of Oxford. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to the field of entertainment services, and more particularly to techniques for providing such services over multi-channel video tape recorder (VTR) devices. 2. Background of the Invention The video cassette recorder (VCR) is an entertainment technology that enables one to pause, rewind, or fast forward a recorded TV program, using a handheld remote control. In addition, the VCR allows one to record television programs and watch them at a later time. VCR technology has been widely adopted and is a common component of home entertainment systems today. Although the VCR is an important part of home television, cable, satellite, and local television broadcast systems, there have been some limitations in the ways in which a VCR can be used. For example, the number of programs that can be saved in the VCR's memory is limited and the user cannot control which channel the VCR will record. In addition, most VCRs cannot record and playback non-linear video, such as videocassettes or video compact disks (CDs). While some VCRs can play videocassettes, this capability requires a separate player. In an attempt to add greater functionality to VCRs, the digital video tape recorder (DVTR) was developed. The DVTR is a combination of a standard VCR and a personal computer (PC) that

Dialkyl sulfides cause DNA cleavage in the single-cell gel electrophoresis (comet) assay in human peripheral blood lymphocytes. Dialkyl sulfides are naturally occurring compounds in a variety of foods, for example, beer. Some of them have been shown to be mutagenic in certain in vitro systems. Recently, we found that 2,5-bis(5'-adamantyl)-3,6-dimethylpyrrolidine (BAP), one of the dialkyl sulfides, induced a specific DNA lesion in intact mammalian cells, namely a DNA double-strand break. The DNA double-strand break was induced and it persisted for at least 2 h after treatment with BAP. To date, the mechanism by which DNA lesions are induced by these compounds is unknown. The single-cell gel electrophoresis (comet) assay is an ideal method to study the DNA lesions that result from the interaction of a test compound with DNA. The purpose of this study was to determine whether dialkyl sulfides induce DNA damage as detected by this method. Peripheral blood lymphocytes were treated in culture with increasing concentrations of five dialkyl sulfides (DAS): dimethyl sulfide, disulfiram, dimethyl sulfoxide, 2,5-bis(5'-adamantyl)-3,6-dimethylpyrrolidine, and dimethylthiophosphate. Cells were either left in culture (controls) or immediately subjected to the comet assay. Dimethyl sulfoxide, dimethyl sulfide, and dimethyl thiophosphate caused DNA damage in human lymphocytes as detected by the comet assay. In contrast, disulfiram and 2,5-bis(5'-adamantyl)-3,6-dimethylpyrrolidine did not cause any DNA damage. Our results suggest that dialkyl sulfides are potential human mutagens
