Citing poverty and low self-esteem, Ms. Correa has been a victim of bullying and harassment for years, bullying that began online. She has more recently had to deal with recent attacks on her household. After a message was posted on Facebook (now deleted) calling for members of her household to be killed, she and her sister were held at gunpoint by members of a local gang and told to "go back to where you came from." "I'm always afraid," she said. "My sister and I are still traumatized. We live in fear." Victims of harassment are encouraged by a range of public officials, including police and prosecutors, to remain silent. They must be responsible for their own safety, they are told. But that means victims must remain silent and stay in their homes. They cannot go out — even to go grocery shopping, or to take the bus or subway — and they cannot tell anyone about their ordeal, even family members who may be able to intervene, because they believe the threats will continue. It was released direct-to-DVD on May 18, 2004. The film was directed by Jeffery C. Reid, and stars David Carradine, who also wrote the script for the movie, and Neve Campbell, in her final appearance in a film. During the six-month filming of the movie, producers had to shoo away a herd of zombies from the set. The script for the movie was given to David Carradine to write, with producers telling him to just "make it funny". During writing, Carradine changed some of the characters' personalities. At times he felt as though the storyline had been "fudged", but he persevered and finished the script. Neve Campbell, who had also been in his previous film, Wild Wild West, reportedly read the script and showed her enthusiasm for the film to David. After receiving $3 million for the production, Paramount Pictures decided to release this as a direct-to-video movie in order to make some profit. However, the movie received mediocre reviews, and it was considered a flop by David Carradine.[1] The movie deals with six fur trappers and their attempts to leave a fictional western civilization's (Australia) farmland, in order to escape the Odenavirus. Contents Setting and cast The movie takes place in a living, post-apocalyptic town called Wolf's Crossing, a settlement for the descendants of those who survived in the old world, and to whom the arrival of the undead supposedly holds a great deal of fear. Because the town is afraid of the zombies, it has maintained militia and armaments with the aim of keeping the zombies out. The main characters are the town's six inhabitants: Eggleston, a gun nut with an IT-level education (who dreams that zombies will a
