pat wanders 'round the world trying to teach languages I'm not interested in teaching my second language, but I enjoy observing native speakers. And I've discovered that many of them use the exclamation point in an odd way. For instance, if you visit Japan in the winter, there are many people on the street wearing thick gloves. They look like something a game-show host might wear. But when you talk to them, they will often exclaim the whole sentence with the exclamation point and an "awesome" sign! A quick Google search turned up several YouTube videos where Japanese people tell you it's the weather that's "awesome!" The idea being that it's a special kind of weather, and if the exclamation point comes up, it's something you should recognize. I'm not really sure what's going on. But I love the idea that the Japanese are like me - it's the fact that the entire exclamation point comes out when you do something awesome that I think is so clever! *** If you go to the "Back in the day...". "Back in the day" was the title of the last blog post – which is all about how a woman's exclamation mark can be different from a man's. I thought it might be fun to take some of the different types of exclamation points in use around the world, and see if I can make a comparison between them. I will then look at the world today and see what exclamation points people are using and why. I'm interested in the cultural history of exclamation points, and where they came from. Does anyone know? It's a fascinating story, and
