This is due to several factors: In Taiwan, the common disease is chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, which is easily found among the elderly. For the chronic disease in our cohort, we may introduce the endpoint of disease course. Second, only hospitalized patients were included in the study; the screening for non-hospitalized patients was completed by contacting patients' regular physicians. This may lead to selection bias and inaccurate results. Third, we did not perform dynamic measurement of lung function after the initial screening; the baseline LOS and LSM values were used to predict their values after approximately two years in the follow-up period. Therefore, the difference between the two groups should be interpreted cautiously. Fourth, the data is collected by a cohort-like design; we cannot know whether the patients will receive treatment if they are enrolled in the cohort. Lastly, our study was conducted in a single center. Although our study included consecutive cases, the results may not be generalized to the entire population. In summary, we found LSM to be an efficient tool in estimating the prognosis of patients with COPD when compared to the baseline FEV1. For certain subgroups of patients, we recommend using the combination of baseline FVC, FVC decline rate, and baseline LSM to increase the accuracy of LSM. Further studies should be conducted to identify other predictors to use with LSM.
