Such ergonomic designs are generally provided in the form of hammerless or double action pistols that utilize multiple firing pin strikes to discharge the weapon. In particular, such hammerless or double action pistols utilize the first firing pin to discharge the gun's single action mechanism and the second firing pin to discharge the gun's double action mechanism. The ergonomic advantage of the hammerless or double action design is that the shooter does not need to pull the trigger to discharge the weapon, thus reducing the fatigue experienced by the shooter, and, in particular, the index finger of the shooter's hand. Although the double action or hammerless design is a significant improvement over the single action design, the multiple firing pin strikes can still cause excessive hand fatigue in the shooter. In particular, the trajectory of the bullet can cause the bullet to strike the hand, or the synthetic fiber in which the bullet is encased, causing severe deformation or breakage to the hand and finger portions of the shooter's hand. Because of this, current hand gun designs have attempted to reduce the occurrence of a damaged hand and finger. Specifically, in Glock, Inc.'s double action design, the finger rest is shaped in the manner of a curved leaf spring. When the finger rest engages the user's finger during use, the thumb of the user's hand is placed in tension against the bottom of the finger rest, thus causing the finger rest to absorb or dampen the recoil of the weapon during firing. However, this design has the potential to fail in that the spring action of the finger rest could cause the finger rest to bounce off of the users finger during recoil. Additionally, the fingers can also hurt in the event the finger rest is too forceful. Additionally, if the finger rest is moved to the side of the weapon, as occurs with all users, the firing pin will strike the finger rest and it e79caf774b
