The demonstration that the clinical manifestations of autoimmune diseases are due to abnormalities of the immune system has led to the identification of both auto-reactive cells and auto-antigens. The mechanisms by which these abnormalities lead to tissue damage and functional dysfunction are poorly understood and the potential tissue-specific or organ-specific target autoantigens may vary between different autoimmune diseases. In order to begin to understand the pathogenesis of human autoimmune diseases, animal models have been developed. The various strains of mouse and rat and non-human primates have been studied with the aim of identifying and characterizing the specific defects which lead to the development of these diseases. These studies have demonstrated that in many of these diseases it is not possible to predict which cells will be involved, the anatomical location or the molecular mechanism leading to immune dysfunction. Nevertheless, the mouse and rat models are extremely valuable in demonstrating the pathogenesis of immune-mediated diseases because they provide the same tissue-specific in vivo cell populations as found in the human disease and the same lymphoid microenvironment as found in the affected human tissues. Thus, the disease-specific animal models represent a valid way to investigate both the autoantigenic target and the pathogenic mechanisms involved in human autoimmune diseases.
