The microtubules of spermatozoa undergo extensive structural and dynamic reorganization during the acrosome reaction. As a result of these changes in microtubule structure, the ability of the acrosome-intact sperm to penetrate the egg is lost. We have been interested in identifying the biochemical mediator(s) that stimulate(s) this extensive reorganization. Because the final stages of fertilization in sea urchin egg extracts contain factors that stimulate a similar reorganization, sea urchin egg extracts are the model system of choice to identify the biochemical mediator(s) that stimulate(s) the loss of sperm-oocyte recognition in these extracts. The first model of hormonal regulation of microtubule structure and dynamics that we examined was that of the activation of the acrosome reaction by progesterone. The effect of progesterone on microtubule structure and dynamics could be blocked by incubation with anti-progesterone antiserum that specifically neutralizes progesterone. In addition, the addition of exogenous progesterone stimulated the reorganization of
