In the wake of the widely publicized attacks on cities, businesses and groups in Syria this past week, with reports of as many as 40 people killed and some estimates at over 100, the immediate focus has been on the consequences of the conflict for civilians, but the international community, in coordination with the Syrian government, is rapidly rolling out a $1 billion humanitarian assistance plan. This much money might seem like a lot of aid, but it is small compared with the immediate and long-term needs. Most important, it is not nearly enough to ease the pain of the Syrian people. The Obama administration is already moving to provide $60 million in medical aid and is preparing to provide some economic support. The U.N. Security Council is expected to vote on a resolution on Wednesday to authorize the provision of $1.5 billion in humanitarian assistance. Advertisement But money is not necessarily the best way to help. What the U.N. and aid organizations should look to do is provide support to the local groups that are already helping Syrian civilians. Unhappy with the Assad regime and the rebels, Syrian citizens have opened their homes and given to their neighbors; village doctors and schools have been established; and people have been organizing aid convoys on their own. In northern Syria, there are already groups of local residents who are providing medical care, offering shelter to families and searching for and destroying land mines in people's backyards. This is the least we should be doing. It is very tempting to focus on the immediate needs, and to wonder what can be done to help the crisis. But it is important to focus on the basics, because the in-country assistance can, and should, be sustained. Many of these groups will be the most important source of aid for the Syrians, if it can be made available. As the Saudis and others have made clear, they are willing to help through aid organizations, but not as
