When the Great Gatsby first emerged onto the film scene in 1925, the response was a mixed one at best. Some hailed the sweeping, romantic view of life in 1920s America, while others found it empty, overblown, and inaccessible. At the same time, the story was a tough sell. American audiences had been raised on regular monthly installments of high melodrama and by the 1920s had become immune to it. Adapted from F. Scott Fitzgerald's novel, the Great Gatsby made the transition from book to film without any trouble. Screenwriter Jo Swerling took Fitzgerald's larger-than-life characters and stripped them down to their essential heart, an American classic with an American soul. The film contains two major stars: the beautiful Myrtle Wilson and the way-too-catchy Jay Gatsby. The rest of the cast consists of small roles, most of which were non-speaking. The biggest name was Claude Rains, a close friend of actor James Stewart and eventual star of the radio series, The Rains Came. Today, Rains is mainly remembered for his role as Doctor Manette in the 1950s TV series, The Prisoner of Zenda. Gatsby's real name was Tom Buchanan, but he decided to go by the name Tom, since he was the son of a wealthy banker. It's unclear if the nickname Gatsby is a holdover from when his father was Tom Sawyer. It's also unclear why the punning automobile enthusiast originally chose to drive a purple car, a nod to the revolutionary purple martin mascot, but the symbolism didn't end there. Tom is first seen on the dance floor of the Daisy Buchanan party. He watches his brother, Nick, dance and is enraptured by the sight. He slips away and then returns to the party.
