Changes in semicircular canal morphology as a consequence of large-aperture correction of chronic ipsilateral horizontal canal canalithiasis. Large-aperture corrected translabyrinthine mastoidectomy is frequently performed on patients with intractable vertigo who demonstrate gross horizontal semicircular canal (SCC) collapse. However, these patients often have congenital ampullary dysplasia in the horizontal SCC. We hypothesized that an air-filled canal would structurally deform the horizontal SCC in canaloplasty, with morphology similar to that seen on T2-weighted magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). We performed translabyrinthine translocular canaloplasty on six horizontal SCCs with a canal diameter of 3 mm or less and with abnormal egress on preoperative MRI. MRIs were obtained immediately before surgery and 1 week, 1 month, and 3 months after surgery. The canal was evaluated for evidence of air or endolymphatic sac (ES) fluid and compared to preoperative MRI. All six horizontal SCCs demonstrated severe collapse. Subsequently, all were filled with air within the horizontal SCC on MRI. The change in the cross-sectional area of the horizontal SCC was significant as compared to preoperative MRI ( $p = 0.009$ ). There was one recurrence of symptoms in a patient with congenital dysplasia and no recurrences in patients without congenital dysplasia.

Translabyrinthine translocular canaloplasty was effective in correcting the horizontal SCC collapse caused by intractable intractable horizontal SCC collapse with minimal risk of recurrence. The morphologic changes occurred primarily in the region between the modiolus and the oval window. It remains to be determined if these findings can be detected earlier with imaging modalities other than MRI.Deyan Sudjic, the founder of gaming company Massive, has passed away after suffering a brain hemorrhage.
